This Artist's Time Is Worth But be sure to sign it."

This artist's Time Is Worth a Dollar a Minute.

"Yes, Mr. Baker, your work is not without merit," said Weston, of the Weston Advertising Agency. "But we already have one good commercial artist. We could use you only as a second string man; on lettering jobs, preparation of sample sketches, &c. For work of that character we could pay only $18," and Weston, a little runt of a man, who for some incomprehensible reason, reminded one strongly of a toad, studied the application of the strongly of a toad, studied the application of the strongly of a toad, studied the application of the strongly of a toad, studied the application of the strongly of a toad, studied the application of the strongly of a toad, studied the application of the strongly of a toad, studied the application of the strongly of a toad, studied the application of the strongly of a toad, studied the application of the strongly of a toad, studied the application of the strongly of a toad, studied the application of the strongly of a toad, studied the application of the strongly of a toad, studied the application of the strongly of a toad, studied the application of the strongly of a toad, studied the application of the strongly of a toad, studied the application of the strongly of a toad, studied the application of the strongly of a toad, studied the application of the strongly of the strongly of the strongly of the strongly of a toad, studied the application of the strongly of the stro cant with assumed indifference. Baker's work was far superior to his present artist's and he intended to use him for his best clients, but, realizing, from past experience, that most arttots are lacking in business ability, he hoped to get this new arrival in the city at bargain rates.

"Eighteen dollars a day or a week?" inquired Eaker.

"A week, of course," snapped Weston.

"We don't pay commercial arlets bask presidents salaries in this

The artist gathered his sketches to-cether and replaced them in his port-folio. Then he arose to leave. "Not interested?" inquired Weston.

"You don't want an artist, Mr. Wes-lon," was the reply. "Why don't you advertise for an office boy if that's what you're after?" And Baker left the reon.

"Well, that's the 'last shot," reflected the artist as he stood on the street corner surveying the passing traffic. "Here I've been in this town a week, I've covered every photo studio and every advertising agency and there isn't a job in the city. I've got to stir up something." Entering a hotel, Baker seated himself in the lobby to ponder on the situation over a cigar.

"There's a queer looking old codest," he reflected, as he noted a fat man with a huge, bulbous proboscis, who sat within his range of vision. And the artist idly sketched the un-

"How was that" inquired Baker, interestedly.

"Oh, it was some years ago," said the stranger, "in a distant city. One of you fellows dropped into my office one day, sketched me in about five minutes and sold me the picture for the works will treasures it. She My wife still treasures it. She it framed and money wouldn't "Have a cigar," said the artist. "I owe it to you," and with this cryptic utterance, he handed the stranger a smoke and abruptly left the hotel.

Next morning, provided only with a pencil and pad, the artist boarded the elevator and rode to the top floor of a large office building. Entering an office, he found a real estate man an office, he found a real estate man seated at his desk scauning the mora-ing paper. "Don't stir," said Baker, and seat-
